

Riga a City at the Crossroads of European Economic Links

The Latvian capital city of Riga is the largest centre for business and culture in the Baltic States. Over the course of eight centuries, the city has established trade, finance and culture at the crossroads where the West meets the East on the shores of the Baltic Sea. The city has been home to people of a wide variety of nationalities. The fact that Riga was an important part of the historical development of European business and trade is signified by the city's admission to the Hanseatic League in 1282.

Over the last 10 years, Riga has regained its important place in European business life. Riga has a modern airport, more than 15 banks, countless foreign company representations and business centres. The city provides facilities for international congresses, conferences and high-level meetings with entirely state-of-the-art equipment. Modern entrepreneurs, and these distinguishing business-class hotels are available for themselves and their fine dining services. Latvia's dynamic economic development has been based not only on large companies and foreign enterprises, but also on local small and medium-sized companies. Latvia is a candidate country of the European Union, and it is very welcoming when it comes to foreign investment.
